Preface

Poetry and verse were a common staple of 19th century life, ranging from doggerel and bush verse to ‘high’ poetry. The advent of the local newspaper press permitted the dissemination of poetry to a wide audience who might—under normal circumstances—be unable to fund the purchase of books.

Later, local papers commenced the publication of stories and bush yarns, and, eventually, the serialisation of popular novels. The first Albury newspaper, The Border Post, is no exception. This index demonstrates the wide range of poetry and short fiction offered to the readership, fiction drawn from British, American and Australian papers, magazines and books.

The author is indebted to Rod Kirkpatrick for some background information on the history of the Border Post and to Jane Downing for critical feedback on the text.

Introduction

This index covers fiction published in the Border Post from the paper’s commencement in 1856 until 1885. Initially, it had been intended to cover all fiction printed in the Border Post. This quickly became an impossible task, as the paper often ran short, eight-, quarter- or half-column narrative and prose fiction items, either verbatim or paraphrased, which were not attributed and more often than not did not have a title either. Faced with these difficulties, it was the decided to limit the index to poetry (p. 15 passim) and major prose items (p. 61 passim). Given these qualifications, the latter compilation does not claim to be exhaustive treatment of the subject matter.

The year 1885 provided a convenient break as in January 1886 the Border Post changed from a bi-weekly 4-page paper to a family paper with 4 pages on Wednesdays and 16 pages on Saturdays. This increase in page volume allowed for the inclusion of more fiction and, significantly, the serialisation of novels. The period 1886 to 1902 will be covered in a future volume.
The Newspaper

Founded in 1856 by George Mott, Albury’s first newspaper, the Border Post, has a rich and varied history. George Henry Mott, born in Hammersmith (London) on 13 May 1831, came to Australia in 1853, working for the Melbourne Argus and the Melbourne Morning Herald. In 1854 Mott moved to Castlemaine in the central Victorian goldfields where he edited the Herald-owned Mount Alexander Mail. In 1855 Mott moved to Beechworth, where he became partner in and editor of the Ovens and Murray Advertiser, a paper founded a year earlier by Richard Warren.

In mid-1856 George Mott struck out on his own when he founded The Border Post in Albury. This was a brave commercial move if we consider that the total population of Albury amounted to approximately 600 people, and that of the district did not exceed 900 people. In March 1857 Mott changed the name to The Border Post and Murrumbidgee Advertiser. As the new masthead suggests, Mott hoped to attract a readership as far afield as Wagga Wagga, Deniliquin and possibly Hay. Mott’s start in Albury was not an auspicious one as his printing press, overlanded to Albury from Melbourne, fell into a flooded Murray River when the punt founderd in shallow water. The press could not be salvaged until the river fell, thereby delaying the launch of the paper. The first issue of the Border Post appeared on 4 October 1856—a two-page weekly paper printed on this hand press with a price of one shilling per copy. The length of the paper varied as a two-page supplement could be inserted as required. By February 1857 the paper moved to a regular length of four pages.

The first Competitor

 Barely two years after its inception the Border Post received competition by The Albury Telegraph and Federation Journal. Founded by Christopher Moore and Weston James Hatfield the Telegraph commenced publication on 3 April 1858. As a preemptive measure, on 27 March 1858 Mott dropped the cover price of the Border Post from one shilling to six pence and increased the frequency to two issues per week. Mott claimed the Border Post to be the "largest and cheapest country newspaper in the colony of New South Wales." For a short time Albury, a town of some 640 residents, enjoyed two newspapers. Whether Mott was about to give up, or whether this was merely a ruse to force the issue, Mott offered the Border Post for sale on 12 May 1858, claiming he was about to leave for England. At the time, the physical property of the paper comprised of a slab printing office and a cottage (four rooms with a veranda on two sides and a large stone cellar). In the event Mott stayed, and on 24 August 1858 Mott and Hatfield amalgamated both papers. Their partnership was not of long duration, however, as it was dissolved on 3 December 1858. Hatfield went to Deniliquin to manage the Pastoral Times.

Expansion and Syndication

Mott, desiring to expand, was on the lookout for new partners. Effective 1 January 1859 the Border Post was owned by Ashworth, Boyer & Co, which had four partners: Felix Ashworth, James Boyer, George Mott and his brother Arthur Robbins Mott. Ashworth and Boyer bought the paper as a 'commercial speculation.’ Felix Ashworth had only recently immigrated from Lancashire, becoming a resident of Albury in early 1858. Everything went well and with the capital the joint venture founded the Chiltern Standard and Murray Valley Mining Reporter in August 1859 as well as the Ovens Tribune in Beechworth. This spread proved too great. The partnership was formally dissolved on 31 March 1860 and the operations were broken up into the Ashworth and Boyer-run Albury paper and the Mott-run Chiltern and Beechworth papers.

Felix Ashworth, married then for less than four months, drowned on 4 October 1860 in Billabong Creek near Cannago when watering his horse while returning from a business trip to Deniliquin. It seems that Boyer could not or would not run the paper on his own. A month after Ashworth's death George Mott, and his Chiltern editor George Anderson, acquired Ashworth's share and merged the Border Post with the Federal Standard. This meant that Mott and Anderson were the majority share holders in the operation and thus had editorial control.

Mott produced a Chiltern and an Albury edition under the same masthead until the end of October 1861 when separate issues recommenced. During the amalgamated period Mott claimed that the Federal Standard and the Border Post had a ‘guaranteed circulation of 1500 copies each’ and that the paper would be delivered on the day of publication before 8am within a radius of 40 miles from the place of publication.

In January 1863 Mott decided to move to Beechworth and to pursue his fortunes in that thriving goldmining community. To that end Mott placed his Albury property "Morningside" on the market. In addition to the six-bedroom cottage with slab cellar, Mott's property included of a ten-acre vineyard with 3,000 vines. The vine industry in Albury had been booming since it was established by German immigrants in 1851. George Mott, like a number of affluent "capitalists" at the time, had invested in this boom. In 1862 he had produced 120 gallons of wine, with a harvest worth 400 gallons expected for 1863. Yet, compared to the gold-driven boom at Beechworth, Albury’s economic development was more staid. Mott’s decision to sell out in Albury and only retain the Border Post as an asset there was a shrewd business decision: the vineyard sold well and in the booming Beechworth economy Mott could increase his profits.

A Serious Competitor

Mott’s first attempt at newspaper syndication was not well received in Albury as the local content declined. This could be compensated for by its new rival, the Albury Banner. In July 1860 the Border Post received its first serious competition, which after a shaky start displayed staying power, the Albury Banner, first published by the Albury solicitor Samuel Fry Blackmore. From 12 January 1861 to April 1862 Alfred Banfield was proprietor. In April 1862 the paper was acquired by George Adams who retained it until his death in 1918 and thereby provided stability. The Albury Banner, edited for the first 50 years by Foster Cooper, was to stay in business until 26 May 1950.

In January 1863 Mott tried to offer the Border Post on a daily basis, after it had swelled to an 8-page paper on Wednesdays and Saturdays. This move was only short lived as it did not prove economically viable with the competition to contend with. From March 1863 to February 1864 the Border Post appeared three times a week.

In March 1863 Mott further expanded his newspaper empire and acquired another Beechworth paper, the Ovens Constitution. To compensate, he closed down the Ovens Tribune. With three papers in Albury, Beechworth and Chiltern, Mott could claim to own ‘the largest country newspaper in the Australian colonies’, steam-printed with an output of ‘2000 impressions per hour’ and a circulation of 4,000 copies a week, effectively covering north-eastern Victoria and the southern Riverina. The three papers, appearing under three different mastheads, were essentially the same, with only very minor changes to content. Advertisements paid for appearance in one paper, for example, appeared in all three.

Further Competition

In mid 1863 yet another competitor appeared on the Albury scene, indicating that though small, the market was not deemed saturated. On 15 August 1863 Maurice Neligan founded The Albury Advertiser as a competition paper to the Border Post and the Albury Banner. Just as five years earlier, however, Albury could barely sustain two papers. A third, with essentially similar points of view to the Border Post, was simply not viable. Not surprisingly, Neligan had to sell after only two months of operation. Mott and George Anderson bought out the Albury Advertiser on 29 October 1863 but continued to publish it for three months in tandem with the Border Post. The Advertiser continued to be edited and managed by Neligan. One can only speculate why the Advertiser was allowed to continue. It is possible that Mott wished to find out which of the two imprints he owned should be shut down. Alternatively, Mott was desirous for Neligan to get more expertise as a newspaper publisher. Finally, the paper was closed down on 6 February 1864. On 23 February Mott sold the Border Post to Maurice Neligan, who published it as an amalgamated paper, using the Albury Advertiser’s type fount and smaller paper format. Mott seems to have moved his printing plant and the type stock to Chiltern.

Despite the reduction of the offerings back to two papers, the amalgamation of the Albury Advertiser with the Border Post was not a successful venture. This was in part due to a newspaper tax of 6d effective April 1864 for all papers sent by mail in New South Wales. This effectively doubled the cost of papers to all regional subscribers. Given that the *Border...
Introduction

der Post was issued three times a week at that stage, the impact of the impost was substantial. In June 1864 Neligan offered the Border Post, both the printing plant and the copyright with the good will, for auction. After only four months without it, Mott reacquired the paper copyright before the auction, continuing the paper with Neligan again staying on as editor. The last issue in the old format appeared on 5 July 1864. The printing plant seems to have found another buyer. Mott printed the Border Post on old Chiltern printery foundry stock and paper as evidence by the fact that the paper format reverts back to the large sheet size and a very worn type face. Mott also dropped the frequency back to one issue per week, blaming the postage tax.

By this time Mott once more part-owned and ran three papers in North-Eastern Victoria: the Border Post, the Chiltern Federal Standard, and the Beechworth Constitution. Once more Mott attempted to syndicate local papers. This time he retained the local mastheads to maintain the illusion of distinct papers, but shows the syndication in the impression. As a result of the syndication the Albury news content of the Border Post decreased again. In October 1865 Mott reverted to printing the Border Post in Albury rather than in Chiltern to counteract the resultant loss in market-share.

Mott also moved back to Albury and embarked on a civic career as Alderman (1866–1869) and, in 1868, as Mayor.

The Affleck Period

By the second half of 1869 Mott had decided to sell up for good. In late June 1869 Mott, Anderson and Eliza Boyer, widow of Mott’s partner James Boyer, sold the Border Post to Adam Wilson Masson & Co. Six weeks later, Mott and Boyer sold their interests in the Federal Standard to Anderson, thereby ending all association with the North-East Victorian and Albury newspapers. Mott moved to Hamilton (Vic). in 1870, where he part-owned and edited the Hamilton Spectator.

With the beginning of 1870 the proprietors of the Border Post traded under the names Masson and Affleck. Thomas Affleck had been a foreman from George Adam's Albury Banner operation and brought with him the necessary experience to run a competitive regional newspaper.

That partnership was dissolved on 17 February 1871 with Masson pulling out. It seems that Affleck tried to manage on his own, but could not finance the paper. Three months later Affleck formed a partnership with J.C. Gray, who had previously been working for the Albury vigneron and wine merchant James Fallon.

In addition to their newspaper business, Affleck and Gray acted as booksellers and stationers, sold musical instruments and traded as seedsmen. The latter variation to the 'normal' business of a country newspaper is understandable if we consider Gray's background. Also, Affleck himself had a deep interest in sericulture and gardening.

In addition to the Border Post, Affleck and Gray also published the annual Border Post Almanac. It commenced as a single sheet calendar inserted in a late December issue of the Border Post, but by 1877 had extended into a small duodecimo volume of 80 to 120 pages.

The Albury Banner continued to be the main competitor. Though a weekly paper, it attracted a stable following. With a mix of news, current affairs, gardening, farming, sport and household columns, as well as serialised novels, the Banner was a family paper. Its focus on the needs and aspirations of the small selectors earned it the epithet "the Cocky's Bible". Clearly, the Banner's approach was one which the Border Post had to take seriously. From 1886 onwards the Border Post changed its philosophy and became a ‘family paper’ of 8 pages on Tuesdays and 16 pages on Fridays. Like the Banner the Friday edition had a gardening and a ladies page, as well as a regular serialisation of a novel, and a number of poems.

Affleck and Gray continued to run the Border Post until 3 September 1887, when the partnership was dissolved. Affleck continued as sole owner.

Demise

At the end of the 19th century Albury had three regular papers: the Border Post, the Albury Banner and the Albury Daily News. In addition, other papers had come and gone, such as the Albury Herald (a daily paper produced by the Banner) and the weekly magazine Table Talk. The Border Post maintained its presence and outlasted many of the competitors.

The demise of the Border Post was both due to the economic pressures and to fatigue by its owner. After some forty years in the newspaper business, 30 years of it owning and running the Border Post, Thomas Affleck was ready to retire. An advertisement in the paper, inserted on Tuesday, 30 September, mentioned that the publication of the Border Post would be suspended subject to new proprietary arrangements. These never eventuated. On Friday 3 October 1902 the Border Post issued its last copy.

Potential interested buyers seem to have believed that there was not enough market to sustain another paper and that Albury was well served by the a daily (Albury Daily News) and a weekly paper (Albury Banner).

The sons of George Mott, Hamilton Carnock (1871-1963) and Decimus Horace Mott (1873–1947), both with ample experience in the Victorian and Western Australian newspaper business disagreed. They observed the Albury situation and saw a business opportunity. In October 1903 they set up a new daily newspaper, the Border Morning Mail. It flourished and continues until today (as the Border Mail), having outlasted all its competitors.
Fiction Published

Early regional papers in the Australian colonies mainly carried news, editorials and local advertisements. On the 'lighter side' they included small snippets of "wit and humour" and some fiction. The latter was necessarily confined to poetry as this was as much as a four-page paper could accommodate. Figure 1 shows the frequency at which poetry was published by the Border Post as expressed in the percentage of issues each year that carried verse. The range of verse, from doggerel to bush ballads to literary poetry, was a common art form in the mid 19th century. Some of the letters to the editor (#1, 15, 22, 77), as well as some election announcements (#4–7) and even advertisements (#8) were expressed in verse. Prose fiction was expensive and was thus limited. This is well reflected in the pages of the Border Post, which focussed on verse over prose in its offerings.

The initial Border Post as conceived by George Mott carried almost no poetry, bar a letter to the editor in verse and poems on the Hume Testimonial (#2). The change of ownership to Ashworth and Boyer saw some verse being published, mainly electoral statements and a few quotes from literature. Despite this, the amount of fiction published remained very small.

All of this changed in November 1860, when George Mott reacquired the Border Post. From then on a regular poetry column was included, placed on the top of column one on page four (the back page). This can be interpreted as a reaction to the presence of the rival paper, the Albury Banner, which from its conception in July 1860 carried a poem in each of its issues.

From then poetry was printed in more than 50% of all issues, with all or close to all issues carrying poems in 1861 and 1867. The percentage of issues with poetry declined dramatically during the Masson and Affleck period (1869-1873) but rose again to better than 60% during the Affleck and Gray period. This may again be in response to the Albury Banner. From the mid 1870s the Albury Banner serialised novels, such as Mary E. Braddon’s ‘The Lovels of Arden’, ‘Only a Clod’ and others, although at the same time poetry occurred only rarely in the Albury Banner, mainly in the form of original poetry. On occasion ‘selected poetry’ was republished from other newspapers.

The Albury Banner made little attempt to match the Banner’s focus on short and serialised fiction. With the expansion of the Border Post into a more family-oriented paper in 1886, novels were serialised, but in an abridged form. This period is outside the chronological scope of this volume.

Sources

The vast majority of the fiction items were published without attribution. Of 1091 items listed in this bibliography, 259 or 23.7% are attributed. As with all newspaper proprietors, Mott and his successors also operated a stationery store and sold colonial, American, and British papers and magazines, as well as books, from which material could be readily sourced.

Between 1860 and 1868 Mott sourced his fiction—where he acknowledges the source—from Australian (Goulburn Herald) and American (Harper’s Monthly, New York Clipper, New York Herald), but predominantly from British newspapers and magazines (Blackwoods Magazine, Chamber’s Journal, London Punch, Macmillan’s Magazine, Masonic Harp, Morning Paper, St. James Magazine, Temple Bar, The Field, Theatrical Journal). During Maurice Neligan’s brief period of ownership of the paper (February to July 1864) the sources were largely similar (Belfast Daily Whig, Blackwood’s Magazine, Fraser’s Magazine, London Punch, Melbourne Weekly Herald).
Right:

In addition Mott published some local contributions. During the Affleck period local contributions continued to be received and printed as opportunity arose. On occasion the editor of the Albury Banner provided feedback in the columns. In August 1888 we find this entry: "To J.H.—the poetry is not quite up to the mark of publication."

For the Affleck period we are better informed as to which books and papers the 'The Border Post Fancy Goods & Book Emporium' stocked. In preparation for the Christmas period of 1873 the Border Post advertised 'a large and superior stock of fancy goods', including works by Dickens, Lever, Wood, Trollope, Disraeli, James, Dumas, Ouida, Kingsley, Grant, Home Lee, Sir Walter Scott, Whyte, Melville, Wilkie Collins, Bulwer Lytton, and Lover, as well as 'a large assortment of children's picture books.'

The Border Post regularly received a number of newspapers from which the editor extracted newsworthy items—often liberally reproduced. Affleck and Gray acted as agents for the Ovens and Murray Advertiser (Beechworth), Daily Telegraph (Sydney), the Weekly Times, the Town and Country Journal (Sydney), the Australasian (Melbourne) and the Leader (Melbourne).

3. Advertisement in the Border Post 30 August 1871, p.3.
In the 1880s Affleck and Gray also received the following overseas journals on a regular basis for sale to local customers: the London Journal, The Ladies’ Journal, the Illustrated London News, Cassell’s Magazine, The Family Herald, European Mail and The Home News. It is likely that items were reproduced from these magazines without attribution to source.

The wide scope of the sources used by the Border Post demonstrates the scope of the editors. Far from being a small parochial paper, the Border Post was a major influence shaping the cultural and political development of North-Eastern Victoria and Southern New South Wales.
